HOMELSSNESS

A WORLD WIDE PROBLEM

Today the United States is facing an economic crisis that often brings references to the Great Depression. One of the biggest hardships citizens are facing today is homelessness. Just as in the years following Black Tuesday, tent cities consisting of a multitude of tents or makeshift shelters in specified areas are just outside city limits are again springing up across the country. Within these "cities" are dozens if not hundreds of families struggling to survive.

According to the National Alliance to End Homelessness, the recession will force an estimated 1.5 million people into homelessness over the next two years.

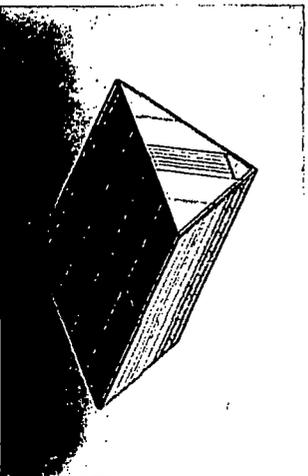

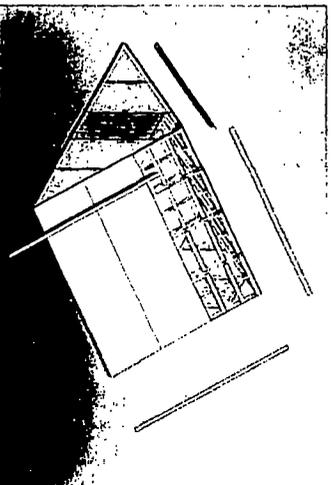

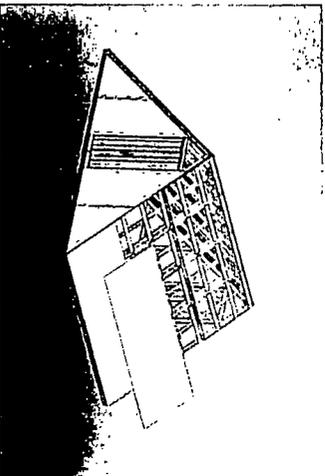

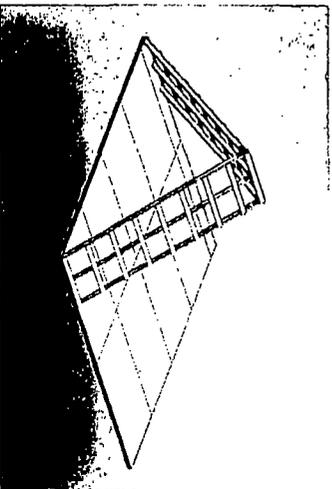

Approximately one-third of the nation's homeless population consists of families with children. With the rapid decline of the economy, this number is continuing to rise. At the end of 2007 roughly 37.3 million U.S. households reported having severe housing cost burdens. Now, two years later, the burdens have grown and many families are falling victim to the home foreclosure crisis as well as the layoffs that have been sweeping the country.

Lasting Effects

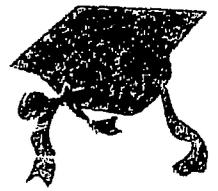

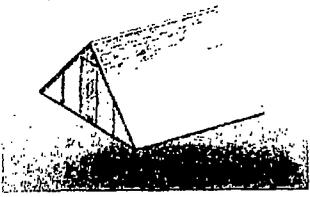

A 2009 study by the National Center on Family Homelessness found that 1 out of 50 American children become homeless each year. The impact this increase is having on the younger generations is nothing less than tragic.

The study estimates that some 83% of homeless children will have been exposed to at least one serious violent event before they reach 12 years of age. Of those, nearly 25% will have witnessed acts of violence within their own families (i.e. physical abuse). Homeless children have three times the rate of emotional and behavioral problem of non-homeless children. They are also four times more likely to experience delayed educational development.
