WHEREAS, of the 838 open missing persons cases¹, 337 cases concern black youth between the ages of 11 and 21; and

WHEREAS, of the 838 open missing persons cases, black girls between the ages of 11 and 21 represented 202 cases, almost one-fourth of all cases, while white girls of the same age represent only 4% of such cases; and

WHEREAS, numerous studies show that young black women constitute a particularly vulnerable group to perpetrators of sex trafficking crimes²; and

WHEREAS, these numbers reflect a striking imbalance of instance and response to black missing persons; and
