Margaret "Peggy" Barber transformed how libraries and librarians promote their services to the public through two initiatives: National Library Week and annual communications audits, Wedgeworth said. National Library Week wound up providing funding that allowed the association to develop a robust public relations function, Wedgeworth said, while the communications' advice that helped the association develop a wide-ranging set of public programs.

In 1970, Barber joined the American Library Association as its official title was associate executive director for communication. Instantly, she began to put her stamp on the organization, recalled Robert Wedgeworth, who was the American Library Association's CEO from 1972 until 1985.

Plotnik worked in the early 1970s for a national magazine for librarians before Barber helped recruit him to join the American Library Association as the editor of American Libraries magazine. The two wound up being colleagues for more than two decades.

"Having walked the walk in her library work, she was a true believer in the importance of libraries to the health and soul of a (community and their transformative powers for the individual users," Plotnik said. "One might have called her a zealot, cheerleader or even missionary for libraries, but she wouldn't have fit the stereotype. Her style was from the heart - never false or overbearing - and her career was one of action, not just words, in bringing the library message, of both traditional and modern services, to the public, to the media (and) to funders."

In 2000, Barber left the American Library Association and formed her own consulting firm, Library Communication Strategies. She shuttered the firm in 2015:

With Linda Crowe, Barber co-authored the 1993 book "Getting Your Grant: A How to Do It Manual for Librarians."
